BATTLESHIP SAVES DRYDOCK.

Braces Run From Ship to Sides to Prevent High Tide From Crushing Them.

The battleship Massachusetts, in Dry Dock 3, at the navy yard in Brooklyn, used yesterday to save the $3,000,000 dock.
The extremely high tide, aided by the heavy rains and high winds, caused the timbers on the eastern side of the caisson to bulge in and fears were entertained that the structure would break and allow the big war ship to sink into the mud. Braces were hurriedly applied during the early morning hours, the big ship being used as the anchor between which the bulging side of the dry dock immense timbers were wedged. Later in the day, when the tide rose almost to the top of the caisson, timbers of great strength were placed on all sides of the ship and the dry dock was saved from caving in by her steel sides.

Naval Constructor Capps and his assistants spent several hours during the early morning figuring on the best way to brace the dock with the least possible chance of injury to the battleship. Besides the big braces and heavy timbers it was decided that the dry dock should be flooded to a certain point. Tools, tool chests and the coats and stray clothing of the workmen employed on the repairs to the Massachusetts were buried under the water that was let into the big caisson, the decision to flood the dock being acted upon almost as soon as it was reached and before the workmen had time to gather up their effects.

Precautions were then taken to prevent the Massachusetts from sinking should the dock cave in. Capt. Eaton said his ship would be all right, as in any event only one compartment would fill.

Great holes have been made by cave-ins of the soil around the sides of the dry dock.
Considerable damage was done by the storm in other parts of the yard, the injury to foundations of buildings and stores amounting to a considerable sum.
